OVERVIEW:

David Tajgman blends and applies his labour relations and legal background with field experience in labour-related matters in a unique manner, resulting in a disciplined approach to development issues. He has worked in virtually all the English-speaking countries of Africa, as well as in Bangladesh, Cambodia, China, India, Indonesia, Jordan, Laos PDR, Mongolia, Nepal, Pakistan, Philippines, the Russian Federation, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates and Vietnam. Using his labour background as a base, he has been engaged in diverse related subjects ranging from labour law and organizational labour policy reform, sectoral labour relations analysis, and structural adjustment, to gender policy, industrial policy, child labour, the rights of the disabled, the informal economy, labour-based employment programmes, small/micro enterprise development, labour clauses and standards in public procurement and corporate social responsibility initiatives, and development programme design and evaluation.

Mr. Tajgman has a strong background in international labour and related human rights standards, including 9 years of work with the ILO in the field and at its headquarters. Much work has made use of these standards in assessing related international trade and economic development issues, and more recently in the design of development and trade supporting projects. Practical experience at the country level contributes to Mr. Tajgman's ability to appreciate the difficult political, social and economic issues related to the application of national and international labour standards. The result is a distinctly practical approach underpinned by an ability to precisely analyze and highlight the broad developmental benefits of the rule of law in these areas. Mr. Tajgman has demonstrated strong writing skills, having published books and articles in the United States, Canada, South Africa, and the United Kingdom, as well as through the International Labour Office in Geneva, Turin, and Bangkok. Complemented by a practical interest in media and technology, Mr. Tajgman is able to design, produce, and implement cost-effective content in his substantive field for the Internet.
